There are now in the Scottish National Museum in Edinburgh two cases containing an exhibit of unusual interest—namely, the so-called Traprain aliver. Traprain Law is a curious conical hill of feisite, something terest—namely, the so-called Traprain aliver. Traprain Law is a curious concical hill of felsite, something over 700 feet high, which stands a conspicuous landmark nearly midway between Haddington and Dunbar, about four miles from the sea. It is on the Whittingchame estate, the property of Mr. Balfour, with whose approval and encouragement the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland have for some years past been excavating there, Mr. Balfour generously making a gift to the National ously making a gift to the National Museum of everything that is found. Successive floor levels have been uncovered, with hearths and the stope foundations of buildings the vanished man's lo superstructures of which were presum-

Four coins were found amid the store, the earliest of the Emperor Valens, who began to reign in A. D. 364, and the latest of Honorius, who died in A. D. 463. Independent evidence points to the early fifth century as the probable period of habitation of the highest floor level, and one seems able to assume almost with confidence that this—not far from 1,500 years ago—was the date when the cache was made.
